

Special Request Submissions for the First Issue

The Journal for Human Advancement is working on some special plans for the first issue. To help get things rolling, we want to have an extra section dedicated to a specific theme. Here is the prompt:

What do the terms ‘human advancement’ and ‘human rights’ mean to you?

Consider asking what these ideas mean to your children, your students or teachers, your parents, your grandparents, your friends, your classmates and coworkers.

Answer the question any way you like! Be creative and be original, or tell us something deep and insightful.

As always, we are still seeking regular submissions. Submit anything you think is relevant or helpful, as long as you follow our submission guidelines (available on our website). Submit essays, research reports, photos, drawings, paintings, plays, scripts, videos, dances, songs, lectures, discussions, studio arts, or anything else you desire! If it speaks to human advancement and human rights, we want it! If it will help others understand these concepts and help further our understanding of human rights, we really want it! Submit your works for this special request (or any questions) to journal@robertgoodis.org by December 31!
